1. The idea

Every book begins as a feeling, a memory, or a message. Write down why this story matters to you and who you hope will read it.

2. The draft

A first draft is allowed to be messy. The goal is to reach the end. Steady, small writing sessions carry most authors further than rare long ones.

3. Revision

Read the whole draft before changing anything. Look first at the big picture: structure, pacing, and whether the message comes through.

4. Editing

Editing happens in layers. Developmental editing looks at the story itself, copy editing at sentences, and proofreading at the final details.

5. Design

A cover and interior layout help readers trust the book before they read a word.

6. Preparing to publish

Formatting, ISBNs, and print-ready files turn a manuscript into a book that can be printed and shared.

7. Sharing it

A launch is the beginning of a book's life, not the end of the work. Think early about who needs it and how they will find it.

Return to The Harbor

When your idea is ready to take shape, the Story Door in Story House is a good place to look around.
